[illegible] demoralement and sure decay of the higher [illegible] and faculties. Instead, therefore, of interfering with business, duty, sobriety, piety—with scholarship, economy, virtue, and reverence—amusement, viewed merely as a principle, advances and supports them all. The intellect that plays a part of every day, works more powerfully and to better results, for the rest of the time; the heart that is gay for an hour, is more serious for the other hours of the day; the conscience that reposes for a space is more active when it wakes; the will that rests, is more vigorous than the one that is always strained.

You see, then, that I put amusement among the necessaries and not the luxuries of life. Like sugar, which was long thought a mere palate-pleaser, but which now turns out to be an indispensable constituent of the blood, and one of the most nourishing and necessary articles of human food, amusement has serious practical interest and concern of society, and not a mere indulgence and weakness, to be excused and apologized for. Society is the better, the safer, the more moral and religious, for amusement. It is as much a friend to the church as it is to the theatre; to morals and unsuperstitious piety, as it is to health and happiness. The very word recreation carries the argument in its etymology. To recreate is to re-create, and pleasure and piety have, in this direction, an identical aim,—to renew and edify our nature. Amusement, it is true, recreates in a very different manner from piety. It does not make the bone and sinew, but supplies the roundness of the muscle, the fat and moisture of the system—and while one gives strength and size, the other gives flexibity and grace. [Applause.] Both are necessary to build up the perfect man. [Renewed applause—cries of "Good."]

AMUSEMENT NOT AT WAR WITH DUTY BUT THE EQUIVALENT OF VICE.

But here I shall be met with the suggestion, that, allowing this, amusement, falling in with the tastes, the cloth, the self-indulgent propensities of humanity—being in its very nature easy, careless and gay—tends always to excess—provides amply and extravagantly for its own gratification—is in league with the vanity, vices, and dangerous passions of the human heart, and, instead of countenance and encouragement from the serious class, needs only its rebuke and restraint. Nay, that the very object of religion is to produce a seriousness, self-denial and consecration, which pleasure in every form assails and renders difficult; that it attaches to the world those whom piety is seeking to detach from the world: produces giddiness where religion would give sobriety, and promotes self-forgetfulness and indifference in those whom God's word is seeking to make thoughtful and anxious. Many good and wise people, who have not the least idea of seeing amusement go out of fashion, and who would confess that what they themselves call innocent amusement is necessary and legitimate; who look at the sports of young children—the game at ball, or the skater's flight, the walk in the country, the nutting party, a game at checkers or chess, the music of the piano, the wit and humor of a true story—with sympathy, nevertheless think it their duty to resist the principle of amusement, lest under any concession of its lawfulness, excess should find shelter. [Applause.]

There is, however, no greater mistake in the world, than to imagine that, taking society together, the love of amusement is an overweening passion of humanity. Doubtless it is the ruin of a class. But selfishness, the root of depravity, and the mother of human evils, finds its chief outlets and manifestations in the serious and anxious passions of men;—in cupidity, the love of power, envy, jealousy, and malice. [Applause.] Out of the grand desire to appropriate wealth, power, place, or to avoid want, submission, and injury, spring the worst characteristics of society. [Faint applause.] Falsehood, fraud, violence, anger, cunning, slander, meanness, apathy, vice, and crime, originate in selfishness, which is ordinarily unsocial, stern, sober, laborious, and as far as possible from pleasure or diversion. Instead of being self-forgetful, disposed to relaxation, playful or gay, it is sullen, introspective, tightly girded, and in no mood for delight. For certainly we must not confound things different, and call the grim satisfaction with which the miser pursues his gains, the tyrant his victims, the rogue his prize, with which envy surveys the mortification of a competitor, or hatred the misfortune of an enemy, or jealousy the pangs of a rival—amusement. [Applause.]

Nor are the vices of society, drunkenness, lust and gambling, to be placed among the relaxations and amusements of mankind. They are the serious and horrible outbreak of lawless appetites, which do nothing to recreate, but only to destroy. If they are often found in connection with the pleasures of the world, they are just as often found in absolute separation from them. Indeed, the lack of the wholesome excitement of pleasure is commonly seen producing the noxious excitement of vice; and intemperance, lust, and gambling, have devastated communities, in which public diversions have been scrupulously forbidden. It is a terrible fact, that the first hundred years of Puritanism in New-England was marked alike by ascetic public manners, and the prevalence of vices almost unheard of in our free and more indulgent society; and it is even now asserted that the soberest of our sister States contributes more than any other State in the Union, to the sad catalogue of female frailty. [Sensation and applause.]

THE DANGER OF CONFOUNDING VICE AND AMUSEMENT

There is hardly a more baleful error in the world than that which has produced the feud between morality and amusement, piety and pleasure. By presenting as the mark for reprobation, the recreations instead of the sins of society; by confounding amusements with vices, the moral feeling of the world has been wastefully diverted from its opposition to absolute wrong and depraving affections, into opposition to things innocent, indifferent, or hurtful only in excess; and thus a very mischievous confusion has been introduced into the natural and the Christian conscience of evil. Consider the thick darkness, the absence of interior light and moral order, which is likely to reign in a soul that has been instructed to put dancing, and the representations of shows, spectacles, and balls, into the same disallowance and reprobation in which lying, slander, hatred, and unchastity are kept, and to reckon the love of fun, gayety, and social excitement as a depraved and satanic affection! ["Bravo" and applause.] What but moral confusion, secret protest, insidious revenges, private vices, latent skepticism, and laxity in directions not open to observation or suspicion, can result to many, from such unwarranted and unnatural classifications? It is true the second generation often pays the penalty of the asceticism of the first, but the first usually has a ruinous pity on itself, and treats its resolution in dark and deadly ways. We cannot afford to waste our moral feeling, our sensibility to sin, our powers of self-control and of resistance, upon false issues, or on artificial sins. We want all the tenderness, and all the energy of conscience—all the amenableness to duty, all the fear of God, we have or can cultivate, wherewith to encounter real sins, the actual temptations of the Devil, the positive wrongs to which human life and character are exposed. Every artificial wrong, everything pronounced evil which is innocent, every restraint voluntarily, every self-denial which is unnecessary, is a positive weakening of our moral forces—ammunition used up in a sham fight, when the real enemy is just at our doors. [Great laughter and applause.] It is no uncommon thing, therefore, to see asceticism accompanied by cruelty to others, sanctimoniousness associated with sourness of heart, and separateness from the world, or disgust and contempt for its pleasures, offset with spiritual pride, harshness of judgment, and malignity of temper.

It will not answer, then, for the religious class to hold amusements or pleasure responsible for that depravity of manners, and insensibility of conscience and heart, which they so justly deplore. They had much better attack the egotism, pride, covetousness, indolence, appetite, the vehement passions, and desires of men, in directions and at points where the natural conscience and the grace of God will assist and sustain their onset. It is not in the amusements, but in the serious occupations of society; in business, domestic cares and collisions, rivalries and competitions of interest, conflicts and strifes of feeling, in bursts of passion, or secret, unsocial vices, that covetousness, obedience, the love of truth, and virtue, and God, are lost. Nor has morality or religion any business to indulge its own laziness and lack of discrimination, by denouncing in the gross, what has a mixture of good and evil in it; or to affect from policy, a disapprobation of the principle of amusement, when it only at heart condemns certain kinds and degrees of it. Such want of frankness and truth involves the proper censors of manners in suspicion and contempt, and finally puts the recreation of the world, where unhappily much of it now is, in open defence of piety, or disgust for the church.

I am not here to deny or conceal the exposure to excess, and actual lapse of the young into excess, in the love and pursuit of pleasure. The moment it becomes anything more than a relaxation from toil—the unbending of a bow kept ordinarily at its strain, the exception and not the rule, the labours of the busy, the fun of the serious, the play of the worker, the self-forgetfulness of the thoughtful, the recreation of the weary and exhausted—it is excess. But things are not to be abandoned because their use requires judgment and control. The best things are most open to abuse, and amusement, like food, love, power, money, requires to have the dangers of its pursuit pointed out, but not its lawfulness or its innocency, in its place and degree, denied or concealed.

THE STAGE AS AN AMUSEMENT—ITS ATTRACTIVENESS AND FASCINATION.

It being established, then, that amusement is not a thing to be afraid of; that it is a good, and not an evil; a necessity and not a luxury of civilization; an interest of society which the religious class, instead of regarding with hostility and jealousy, ought to encourage and direct, I come next to inquire, what place the stage has among the amusements of society, and what titles it has to the countenance of serious people.

I suppose it would not for a moment be denied, that if the theatre were compatible with Christian sobriety, it would be the most complete and interesting of all amusements. Nothing but scruples of conscience and a fear of countenancing a seductive pleasure, keeps even the most sober portions of the community from an occasional visit to the play-house. I must except, of course, those who by disease of their sensibility to pleasure, have lost the power of being amused; and those whose original temperament is constitutionally averse to pleasure. But these, few or many, must not mistake their defects for advantages. It is a much greater misfortune not to have the ordinary taste for amusement, than it is not to have the ordinary ear for music. That must be a stupid nature that does not powerfully feel the attractiveness of the stage, when occupied by such persons as Garrick, Talma, and the Kembles; and, purified from what must offend the taste or conscience of good men, the stage filled with moderately good performers, would allure and gratify thousands of sober and discreet people, as nothing else could. The indifferent performances of amateurs are listened to with intense gratification, which, after deducting all the interest of personal sympathy with the volunteers, demonstrates the inherent charm of the stage. There was never a dialogue spoken in a school exhibition which was not ten times as exciting as any monologue, and every additional person added to the scene increased its fascination in a geometrical ratio. [Applause.] If a few rags of scenery or costume were thrown around the performers, how potently was the charm enhanced? In short, in precise proportion to an approach to the public stage, was the amusement complete. But why linger on so plain a point? The stage is the most winning of amusements, because the combination and aggregate of all others. The theatre is itself a magnificent place—the audience a great party in becoming attire. If there were nothing behind the curtain—an elegant room, brilliantly lighted, with graceful tiers of galleries, full of well-dressed people in good humor, and seated in knots of acquaintances, talking, bowing, or gazing, admiring and being admired—would be fascinating to the social and aesthetic instincts of human beings. But there is more than this, even outside the curtain. A great orchestra of music, capable, by its own unaided powers, of delighting an audience. Besides a social party, a grand concert—and the curtain not yet risen! But the curtain rises and displays—what? A gifted person, reading an eloquent narrative, or a melodious poem, in a highly cultivated voice? That indeed would be a high pleasure, such as we sometimes eagerly seek elsewhere. No! but a whole company of persons, especially endowed by nature for the occupation, and trained to its practice, engaged in representing some historical or fictitious story, carefully, and by high and rare genius, wrought to a moving plot, in which each scene and act helps on a conclusion—where the passions, weaknesses, virtues, and complicated motives of humanity, seized in their most affecting and interesting aspects, are not described, but actually represented by persons of talent and skill, carefully cooperating to one grand result! The time of the drama may be a thousand years back, the place five thousand miles off; but the costumes and scenery, with learned artistic care, reproduce what history and art have taught them, and we behold what a little exercise of the imagination makes the very action, the persons, country, town and castle the dramatist has summoned us to see! Can we wonder that an imitation of life itself, in its rarest, most passionate, and heart-moving moments and experiences—where the alchemy of genius and art, fuses it to a few hours the whole conduct and course of a splendid human career—a deep domestic calamity, ambition's bloody road to a throne, love's great sacrifice, jealousy's torturing fears, avarice's pinching and grasping way—Hamlet's thought-palsied melancholy, Lear's phrensied paternal grief, Juliet's innocent passion, Macbeth's remorse—that a pleasure so rich, costly, variously and curiously compounded as this, based upon the deepest, most numerous sensibilities of our nature, should prove universally and permanently attractive? [Prolonged Applause.] The drama condenses what is most intensely interesting or affecting in real life, or from what the constitution of our nature genius knows might be real life, into a compact, rounded, and finished story; omitting what is common-place, irrelevant, or simply painful, and by careful adherence to the great rule of art, which never forgets that its end is pleasure, extracting from crime, or vice, or passion, whatever in their actual occurrence it would shock us to behold, leaves what moves our passions and affections with pleasing though tearful sensibility. The stage takes this drama, and by a living sculpture clothes this wondrous work of literary genius with flesh and blood, substitutes for paper and print, men and women, voices for words, for the dull pictures of the imagination, actual scenery, for descriptions of costume, actual dresses; nay, it invokes gifted men and yet more gifted women to take these places, and with boundless liberality, consideration, expense, builds the temple, collects the properties, and arranges the scene which is to convert this written into the acted drama! and is it possible to conceive that human ingenuity can ever invent any other amusement which can equal, much less exceed, this deeply-founded, slowly-wrought, and most costly contrivance for the public delight and recreation of human beings? [Applause.] Supposing it to be innocent, I perceive no element wanting to render it theoretically a perfect pleasure. It appeals to the intellect, the imagination, the heart, the senses. It has the charm of poetry and music. It unites the interest of a story with the fascination of a spectacle. It calls by turns our emotional and on our critical faculties; now inviting us to yield to the illusion, now, to admire the skill which deludes us; it adds to the sympathy we feel for the persons represented, that we feel with those who represent them; that we feel for the genius which made them representable; and Shakespeare, Hamlet, and Garrick, all pull at our heart-strings in one delicious moment of admiration and sympathy. [Immense applause.] Poetry, invention, story, mimetic talent, elocution, personation, spectacle, beauty, passion, architecture, painting, music, society, light, all combine in the theatre to make it the most brilliant, complete, and untiring of public amusements.

HOW THE THEATRE INSTRUCTS.

Now I am not pretending, you perceive, that the charm or attractiveness of the stage depends firstly and mainly upon its moral teaching, or its moral influence. Amusement loses its quality when instruction becomes its object, and it would be very delusive to anticipate that people would attend the theatre for educational purposes, or cease to attend it because it were proved uninstructive. The instruction to be got from the drama or the stage, must always be incidental, and perfectly subordinate to the pleasure got from them. I do not doubt that there is potent instruction, and moral influence in Hamlet, Macbeth, the Tempest, the Gamester, the Hunchback, Uncle Tom's Cabin, the Rent-Day; but if the satisfaction and pleasure of seeing these plays depended upon their moral influence, or if their performances could be justified only by their direct usefulness to morals, I fear I should lose my place with the serious class. Considering the moral necessity of being happy, it is the various, wholesome and immense amount of pleasure and recreation which the theatre gives that first enlists me in its support. It amuses so large a part of our humanity, amuses the senses and the soul. It calls out, to gratify and refresh them, sensibilities and passions, which the ordinary life of the world does not bring into play, and thus rests the other and earnest powers and feelings of our nature. Removing us from the region of the actual to that of the ideal; from the sphere of the common and natural, into that of the extraordinary and artistic, it changes our world and ourselves, draws upon an entirely new set of powers and sensibilities, while it allows the old set to go to sleep, and thus to repair their waste, while the circle of our development is completing. All amusement does this, and the theatre only more, because it is the most amusing of amusements. It unstrings and recreates by calling into more pleasing and intense activity, the qualities, affections, emotions, ordinarily dormant in the work-day life of society. There, instead of ministering we are ministered unto; instead of acting, we are acted for; instead of planning and scheming, we are watching plans and schemes; instead of feeling for ourselves, we are feeling for others; instead of toiling after a distant consummation, we are enjoying a consummation which is perfected in five acts. Our love of beauty, harmony, heroism; our sympathy with daring, patriotism, passion; our love of light, form, color, elegance, splendor; our admiration for genius, talent, skill; all these sensibilities, which in actual, plodding life, mercantile, domestic, or professional, get little exercise or indulgence, are in the theatre ministered to, and gratified in a way which recreates our common nature. [Applause.]

The use of the theatre, (supposing it free from moral objection, which I by no means assume,) is that it gives so much pleasure, which is a positive and large addition to the general sum of human happiness; and that in giving this pleasure, it satisfies an immense need of recreation, and, quite independently of any direct influence on the moral interests of society—builds up, and supports, and cheers the life and soul of man. I dare not make light of pleasure. God has taken the benevolent care to interpret, in predicating it, and there is too much pain, and drudgery, and necessary sorrow to be offset by it, to allow me to think it a small thing that any considerable mass of human beings are pleased. I will not demand of amusement that it shall directly instruct, warn, elevate, or improve. If it give genuine pleasure, and if it do not corrupt, deprave, or injure, I will bless it, and without a single misgiving invoke the benediction of heaven on its head. [Applause.] Do not, then, perversely read backwards all that has been said of the fascination of the theatre, as if it were so much against it, and not so much in its favor. If it shall afterwards appear that the stage has essential immoralities and perils to society and the soul, wrought into its very nature, and inseparable from it, then we will allow that its attractiveness is a misfortune; its various charms those of a syren that woo to destruction; and that genius, art, beauty, and splendor, have conspired, in the theatre, to make vice seductive, and folly captivating. But I submit, that in the theory of the stage, (a very different thing, possibly, from the fact,) we have got found nothing in condemn—nothing essentially wrong, or otherwise than right. There is nothing wrong in amusement, except in excess; nor in the theatre, the finest of amusements. The dramatic faculty is divinely implanted. It gives life and reality even to portions of the Scriptures. The drama is a species of literature which the world's greatest geniuses have chosen for their own, gaining immortal renown for their labors there. The stage is the drama made more real, and brought within the easier and fuller enjoyment of the best and the poorest judges. So far we are in smooth water.

THE OBJECTIONS TO THE STAGE—ITS CORRUPT LITERATURE AND LOOSE CHARACTERS.

But the breakers begin to threaten us at the very next step. [Sensation.]

It is alleged—and that is the professed sentiment of the serious class—that practically the drama has been a corrupt and corrupting kind of literature, putting into licentious and depraving verse and story, the worst and most seductive experiences of humanity; that it has pandered to vile and vulgar tastes, dramatists having often, or usually, been loose and unprincipled characters, and their readers the more gay and careless portion of society. Doubtless there is truth, and there is also exaggeration in this statement. The great dramatists, whether ancient or modern, Sophocles, Euripides, or Aristophanes, Calderon, Lope de Vega, Corneille, Racine, Shakespeare, are, with the exception of the coarseness which belonged to their respective ages, not open to such charges, although the minor lights unquestionably deserve severe chastisement. But there is nothing peculiar in the abuse of dramatic literature. We do not abandon and discountenance poetry, because Rochester wrote immoral verses, and Moore and Byron, poems which nobody should read. We do not give up novels, Richardson, and Scott, and Dickens, and Thackeray, because Fielding and Smollett, Eugene Sue and Dumas, have often abused their great powers. The best things are most open to abuse; and dramatic literature, you will confess, has not been oftener or worse perverted and depraved than religious literature. Indeed, the Church seized on the drama, when she was most busy in manipulating the human mind into superstition, and perpetrated greater blasphemies and obscenities in the so called Mysteries, written and acted in the middle ages, than the dramatic writers of England or France have ever foisted into their most abominable plays. [Applause.] The drama is a kind of literature whose permanency is guaranteed by the constitution of man. Beginning with the very origin of literature, and continuing thus far on its history with every prospect of ending only with its life—we must expect it to reflect and share the fortunes of humanity, and to find itself, now in the hands of ennobled, and now of descorated genius; here the instrument of the unscrupulous, there the vehicle of truth, honor and inspiration. But how many dissolute and depraving dramatists and dramas would not the judicious and the conscientious consent to bear with and guard against, sooner than lose SHAKESPEARE alone out of the world? The mischievous jack-o'-lanterns and false lights of land and sea may shine on forever, if we can only extinguish them by blowing out the stars and quenching the sun. [Applause.] We cannot obliterate WASHINGTON, to wipe ARNOLD out of American history, though treachery hung by his skirts alone to the fortunes of the race. We must let the tares grow to the harvest for the sake of the wheat. The drama stands in its own right, and in the right of its great priests, the wonderful interpreters of humanity, and great recreators of the race; and all the apostates and criminals who have descorated its pure and beautiful shrine, cannot make its nature otherwise than lawful and honorable, and entitled to the protection of universal reason and justice. [Prolonged applause.] It is indeed deplorable, that the written drama should have ever thrown its fascination around vice and crime, as it is always terrible when genius and wit, when art and skill, enter the service of the devil. Most sad it is that pleasure should ever be associated with folly, or amusement extracted from sin. But literature is not responsible for the abuses to which levity and immorality turn any of its powers; and it is not the drama, but the public and the dramatic authors who are to be censured for the production and encouragement of lax, immoral, and corrupting plays. [Applause.] On this point I shall speak more fully and to better advantage at another period of this address.

And now, if, whatever the theory may be, the drama itself has been practically degraded and abused as a species of popular literature, until sober and discreet people, as a class, have thought it wise and necessary to discountenance the reading of plays—how much more ought the theatre, the acted drama, to be discountenanced and destroyed—when we consider how its actual, practical character differs from its theoretical one, and how little what is said in defence of the ideal stage applies to the real one? For what has the theatre not been, during its modern existence, if the allegations and accusations of the religious class, uttered in a thousand tones, are to be taken without abatement? Has it not been as much the focus of vice as the centre of pleasure? Have not intemperance and licentiousness found a congenial home within its walls? Have not the extravagant fashion, the unscrupulous wit, the reckless passion of the world, been its chief patrons, and found themselves in their natural and unreproved place before or behind the footlights? Have not actors and actresses, as a class, been regarded, by the pulpit, as licensed sinners—utter strangers to sobriety and purity; as persons whose very occupation condemned them to the abandonment of morality and decency;—whose Bible was Shakespeare—whose table of commandments the rules of the green-room—their judgment-seat, the public—their best heaven, the applause of the boxes—their only hell, the condemnation of the pit? [Laughter and applause.] Have not the young commenced their career of disobedience in stealing off to the play-house, and have not its exciting and passionate scenes—its glittering audience and bewitching actors—its ready bar-room, and as ready courtesans, softened and betrayed their feeble virtue, and finished in positive vice what began in youthful folly? Have not indecent exposure, obscenity or profanity of wit, inuendo and levity, characterized the stage? Has not the theatre been the haunt of gamblers, jockeys, men of pleasure, women of the world—of all the light and careless portion of the community, and is it not essentially so now? Moreover, have not highly immoral plays—in which successful villainy or roguery has been applauded—the feats of some "Jack Sheppard" or "Paul Clifford" romantically held up to the admiration or imitation of youth; the betrayal of female virtue excused; the authority of wise parents made contemptible; the rules of morality held up to ridicule, and the habits of piety satirized and scorned? Have not the serious friends of order, purity, industry and religion, felt the theatre to be the very essence of worldliness, wickedness, temptation and sin—an institution to be excluded to the latest moment from every well-governed community—to be avoided by all sober and public-spirited citizens, and placed under the special ban of formal religion, as the devil's own domain, the very gate of hell?

THESE OBJECTIONS APPLY TO THE ABUSE AND NOT THE USE OF AMUSEMENT.

Do I seem to be giving up the whole case? I have a profound though a cautious respect for general impressions, and particularly for the instincts of the religious community, and for what I read, or learned by direct observation or personal inquiry, I believe that the ordinary verdict of serious minds and of the pulpit, respecting the theatre, has many painful elements of truth in it. But I believe equally that it exhibits much extravagance, confusion and illogical reasoning. More particularly I complain that this verdict leaves entirely out of view the uses of the theatre, considering only its abuses; that it takes no pains to recognise what is good, in its eagerness to point out what is evil—or to discriminate between what is essential and what is accidental in this institution; that it confounds the evils around, with the evils within the theatre, and, to come directly to the point, fails to inquire and explain why, and by whose fault, and in accordance with what law, it is, that the immorality and recklessness of society, its folly and vice, have clustered about the theatre. I do not deny the fact; but I deny the totally condemnatory inferences drawn from the fact. For in truth, the Theatre is the very place where, for no fault inherent in itself, the prexisting follies and vices of society will necessarily become apparent. We do not expect to find the follies and vices of society, the levity and ease of a community, gathering around schools and colleges, workshops and churches, scenes of labor and care, any more than we expect to find flies settling upon rhubarb and aloes, and not on molasses and honey. [Laughter.] But it would be quite as reasonable to give up sugar because vermin are fond of it, as to give up pleasure because fools and knaves, the light and the wicked, make it their chief food. [Great applause.] Because folly spends his whole time in laughter, sobriety does not propose to disuse the risible muscles; because drunkenness ruins thousands, and gluttony tens of thousands, virtuous society does not expect yet awhile to give up eating and drinking. [Applause.]

One very large class of the perils of humanity is inevitably and indissolubly associated with its pleasure-loving propensities. It is of the essence of pleasure to lull conscience to sleep, and throw humanity off its watchfulness and resistance. But—mind you—this is not its weakness, but its strength; its use and charm come of its carelessness and abandon. If it did not do this, it would not be the recreation of society. If men were thinking of their duty, or their business, self-discipline, or judgment to come, of serious and solemn concerns in their amusements, they would straight way become no longer amusements, but trying occupations. It is, of course, then, of the very nature of pleasure, to expose and try the character; the powers of resistance are relaxed; the mind and heart are left to the impressions of the time and scene. Just here, then, is the place where the positive, tangible vices of society must appear, or rather, one great class of them—those that affect the senses. But this by no means settles the character of pleasure, any more than it settles the character of the gustatory nerve, that if it did not give us pleasure to eat, there would be no gluttony; to drink, no intemperance! The pleasure of eating and drinking is a universal and positive blessing, and not to be ascribed solely, with some utilitarian philosophers, to the necessity of supplying men with a motive for labor, but to the Creator's benevolent desire to communicate happiness. If the love of pleasure, dangerous as it is, were taken from humanity, if pleasure itself were destroyed, consequences would ensue, vastly more demoralising and fatal than any now proceeding from its abuse! And when we are dwelling exclusively upon the evils of pleasure in any of its forms, it would correct some of our extravagance, to stop and meditate awhile upon its origin, [pointing upward,] its uses, and its necessity. [Applause.]

The attractiveness of the theatre, even to vice and folly, is nothing against it, until it can be proved that they are attracted there by what is bad and depraving. It is not enough to show that they carry there what is bad and depraving, or that they are not kept away by what is bad and depraving there, but that they are attracted by what is bad and depraving. I suppose them to be attracted precisely by what would attract me or you, or any innocent or well-intentioned person—by the love of pleasure, spectacle, society, talent, beauty, light, architecture, and I suppose them to be very innocent so far as the enjoyment of these things is concerned. That, knowing their presence, and consequence or unscrupulousness, the stage should cater to it, is a monstrous evil; that folly and weakness should find those waiting for them there to practice on their propensities; that they should carry their vices and tastes to the theatre with them, is a dreadful and undeniable misfortune to society. But I am yet to see how, because the wicked and the careless like what the good and the careful also like—namely, pleasure—it makes pleasure wrong; and how, because the theatre, in its character of an amusement, attracts the vicious and the depraved, it proves it to be a vicious and depraved amusement. Have the vicious and depraved no human and universal tastes left? are they not still men and women? are not some of their doings and feelings such as the good and the innocent can share? For my own part, I believe the theatre has, in every age, exhibited the vices and follies of society rather than created them, and it has owed its reputation for evil, mainly to the fact, that it has been the only place in which the decency, or virtue, or propriety of society has met the indecency, the vice, and disreputableness. [Sensation.] Now, if the theatre had produced this indecency, vice or disreputableness, or encouraged it, we should condemn it; but I believe, on the contrary, notwithstanding its imperfect administration, it has done something to correct it. Perhaps the most innocent hours of the vicious have been those in which they were publicly amused under the protection of society. For the innocent pleasure, which even vice and folly get out of their existence, is the only part of their career we can look at with any satisfaction—all else is loss and ruin.

ERROR OF THE RELIGIOUS WORLD IN DEALING WITH THE THEATRE.

But, whatever the effect of the theatre is, or has been, having nothing essentially wrong in its principle, and having proved itself to be in fact what in theory it has already shown itself to be, the most attractive and permanent of amusements, a fixed and indestructible fact, it seems to me that sound moralists and Christian leaders and guides have committed a grave and fearful error in their mode of dealing with it. They have made the drama and the stage answerable for all the vices and follies which have gathered round them—a course as unjust as to make the market responsible for the dogs and rats, the thieves and knaves, sure to find a harvest in the most frequented and necessary place. [Laughter and applause.]

I know it will be replied, that patience with evils connected with what is necessary, does not justify patience with evils associated with what is not necessary; that because commerce makes a dangerous life for sailors, we are not to place the dangerous life for actors, which the theatre produces, upon the same plea of a great social necessity; that the vices and follies of trade, of religion, of domestic life, all of which are cardinal and necessary and natural interests of humanity, do not stand at all upon the same ground of absolute discountenance which the vices and follies of an artificial, unproductive, and unnecessary amusement occupy. But there are various forms of necessity, and I am not sure that the necessity of being amused is not as fixed and fatal a necessity as that of being fed and warmed. It is not necessary in the same sense, and yet it may be equally a necessity. We do not commonly place leisure, laughter, love, among the necessaries of life, alongside of bread and water, fire and shelter. Yet in a broad view of social interests and human requirements, they would be found to rank with them, not in the same class, but under the same name of actual necessaries of a true, healthful and vigorous social life. That may well be said to be necessary, which, age after age, and in precise proportion to the influence of civilisation and even of Christianity, is found supported and sustained in the very face of the church, and under the formal ban of religious society. [Applause.] That the theatre has survived the usage it has received from the pulpit and the moralist, exhibits at least its wonderful vitality; and when we perceive that general censure and discouragement have not the slightest effect either in putting it down, or in improving it, why do we not begin to inquire what might be done by treating it with candor and sympathy, to save its uses, and correct its abuses;—[general and enthusiastic cheering]—to turn its fascinations to the account of human happiness, and detach it from the artificial associations which are the real objects of our suspicion and dislike.

When I consider that eight theatres, at least, are open in the City for six nights of every week; that they are constantly frequented, though in very different degrees, by all classes of the community, except a portion of those technically styled professors of religion; that the tastes, morals, manners, happiness of hundreds of thousands of people are affected by them for good or evil, to a degree which almost renders the theatre a rival of the church, I confess that the vastness of this metropolitan interest is too serious an element in our whole civic character and human prospects, to make me willing to ignore it; or, the hope of crushing it being preposterous, to allow me to sit easy while it remains hostile to morality, or in open competition with religion. [Great applause.] I muse, for my part, sake, see what of good it is that gives life to this sturdy tree, which has been so long stricken with the lightnings of the church and still survives in greenness. [Renewed applause.] I must do what I can to direct the efforts of piety and morality against what is vulnerable in the theatre, that their arrows may no longer be wasted upon its adamantine portions. I must strive to obtain a truce between the theatre and the church, the dramatic world and the religious world, long enough for candid consideration of their mutual causes of jealousy and suspicion, their seated opposition and alienation; and endeavor, after all our efforts to crush the theatre have failed, to get the public and the dramatic profession to unite with the moral and serious portions of the community, or what is more difficult, the moral and serious portions with them to reform the theatre; to reduce it to its theoretic, innocent and beneficent office, to make it a legitimate interest and honest charm of society, under the smile of virtue and the protection of religion. [Applause.]

THESE RELATIONS OF THE CHURCH TO THE WORLD—THE SIN AND EVIL OF RELIGIOUS EXCLUSIVENESS.

You will not suppose me ignorant of the alarm or interfering with which such a hope and effort are sure to be received by the class with whom I am arguing. They will say that, instead of reforming the theatre, we shall deform the church; that religion loses its power over men the moment it shows any sympathy with their self-indulgent tastes, and that an absolute distrust and discountenance of the theatre, a complete and thorough separation from it, as from plague and pollution, is the only way to escape its pernicious influence. This, I am aware, is the almost universal method of dealing with the subject among serious persons, and it is because I distrust the general principle which keeps the world and the church at arms' length, that I am emboldened to oppose it in the strongest and most marked form which this opposition or distinction has ever taken. I speak as a friend and humble disciple of the church—a full believer in historical, organized Christianity—a sorrowful observer of the decline of worship, of faith and of reverence in our American society. But I think the weakness of the church as an institution, mainly due to our day to its neglect to claim the world as its charge and to assume its superintendence. I utterly repudiate the "touch not, taste not, handle not," principle, as unsound in theory and impotent in practice. In proportion as the church has shut itself up in its own peculiar life and sanctity, it has created vices in itself and allowed them in the world—in proportion as the world has excluded, banished or lost the church from its pleasures and its companionship, it has degenerated in virtue and encouraged the fanaticism and dogmatism of a special class. [Applause.]

Religion is the salt of the world; not to be hoarded in hard and polished crystals, such as original islands, glittering upon the distant view of passing navigators, but rather to be gathered, and ground, and mixed with the daily food of society, giving purity and flavor to all we feed upon. Christianity is the leaven of the world, inedible in the lump and useless in separation; but mixed with the substance of practical life, leavening wholesomeness, gusto and nutritiveness to what would otherwise be crude, heavy and hurtful. Who shall teach, who perform this, if not the Church? Christ kept the company of publicans and sinners, and was called "a man gluttonous and a wine bibber;" and the Church has only cultivated self-righteousness, fanaticism, and false fervor in itself—and a mere unbridled vice, levity and crime in the world, when it has understood its duty so little as to draw a visible line between the Church and the world—establish different standards of morality, for those inside and those outside its pale; abandoning social life and public amusement, and what is most universally attractive and dangerous, to the unaided charge of the world, and entrenching itself in a monotonous, unlovely and selfish seclusion, of its own.

To this policy must we ascribe its obvious loss of power in the world. Much of the genius, taste, literature, poetry, art of society, are already out, and fast going out of the church; and philosophy, social and natural science, are now, to an alarming extent, in open or secret alienation from it. But, thank God, the world is asking much that the church is losing; for the precepts and spirit of Christ, separated from [illegible] and dogmatic [illegible] and self-commanding [illegible] at large. If the visible church and the [illegible] not are themselves left like the [illegible] in the desert, [illegible] of a vast population, and a vast [illegible] that once surrounded them, but now, out of the line of the commerce, the war, and the interests of the world, the gigantic tombs of forgotten kings and priests, it becomes them to take their settled place at the head of the real concerns of society, advising, partners in the business and the pleasures of the world; guides, friends, [illegible] and helpers of the race, in all efforts to improve manns and save itself. I am a servant not merely of religion, but of the Church, and hope to live and die in this service, but if there is to be a great party fight between the Church and the world, as I dread it, and fall, in defence of Christ as I am, I would make my place and part with the world, against the Church; with sorrow and trembling then, [illegible] view of it; with confident and joyous [illegible] side—for I believe the Christ who [illegible] the world and part of the Church [illegible] eminently a resident with the [illegible] human, and feelings of mankind as being [illegible] fraction of humanity, however [illegible] primitive of his mantle and patronage. [Prolonged long continued applause.]

If, then, the theatre were as bad as the [illegible] which the hagiens, erring women [illegible] an effective part in our Saviour's [illegible] often has the special claim on our [illegible] help—I should not account it [illegible] the stage to itself, or to permit any [illegible] plea to make it an [illegible] are not bound to scrutinize and [illegible] speak with forbearance of the [illegible] of the plow—for I know how [illegible] them are. But I must be faithful to my [illegible] to the race. Those who, under that [illegible] blindness as to their own frames [illegible] truly good men are liable, are willing to [illegible] themselves from the fortunes of their [illegible] their own souls without mean disturbance of [illegible] that millions of their fellow-creatures are [illegible] theirs; to regard the ordinary life of the world as no process and not under the blessing of God, or the service of our Lord and Saviour, may [illegible] by join in denunciation of amusement in [illegible] the theatre in particular. But as, by God's grace, I belong not to this body, and have none of their views or exclusive hopes and prospects, I depart in no degree, from my principles as a minister of Christ, or a teacher of morals and religion, in [illegible] the theory and the practice of amusements, in the [illegible] of my pulpit instructions and my social [illegible] ties, or in countenancing the principle, and so far as examination may justify it, the institution of the theatre. [Applause.]

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCH IN REGARD TO THE THEATRE.

Assuming, then, that the theatre is a great and important fact, an institution so vital and popular, even the serious evils connected with it, owning it; assuming it as already proved that its foundations lie deep in the wants of human nature and [illegible] society; assuming that the course hitherto followed by the Church and the organized friends of [illegible] in regard to it, has had little good effect, I would inquire what course deep, policy and piety [illegible] regard to the theatre. To answer this question we must recall and classify the evils already referred to, which good citizens and Christians deplore, and ask ourselves, in view of the considerations already produced, how they arise, and how they may be abated. These evils fall under four heads:

1. The identification of the theatre with profanity, worldliness, moral indifference, and spiritual death, and its general tendency to reproduce them.

2. Its direct or covert association with, and encouragement of, intemperance and licentiousness.

3. The immorality of plays, either in their general spirit and drift, or in their details, with the [illegible] of manners, costumes, language, [illegible] ally shocking to modesty, and destructive of [illegible] ence.

4. The bad effect of theatrical life upon [illegible] actresses—in a word, the unworthy personal character of the dramatic profession.

These evils, as we have seen, have been [illegible] and are still confessedly great. They have [illegible] them been much greater than they are, and to [illegible] thanks are due to the Church, or the [illegible] public morals, that they have been [illegible] first in, perhaps, as great a degree; the second [illegible] odiously heinous; the third, I fear is [illegible] general [illegible]—the fourth is hopelessly [illegible] tated. From what do these evils [illegible] Who is responsible for them, and who can [illegible] I believe from my very soul—and to what [illegible] clusion has the whole evidence tended? [illegible] Church and the so-called gravity, and moral [illegible] society, are really, though indirectly and [illegible] ally, the authors and propagators of the [illegible] disorders and perilous influences of the theatre [illegible] ing both the dramatic profession and the public [illegible] large comparatively blameless, and answerable only for its more venial sins. [Applause.]

The Catholic Church in mediæval times, in the prosecution of its selfish design to control the human mind, had resuscitated the heathen drama—which in former ages had refined and elevated the morals of Greece and Rome—in the shape of its own [illegible] Mysteries and Moralities. The inherent [illegible] human nature, specially reverted to the [illegible] ard, and gave birth to secular performances [illegible] genially and truly depicting the hopes and [illegible] of our race. Jealous of such a rival, its [illegible] both in revenue and popular influence, it [illegible] excommunicated actors and denied them [illegible] burial. Thus commenced that wicked, [illegible] narrow policy, which, adopted and [illegible] ritan prejudices, was continued and [illegible] the Protestant Church, and now so largely [illegible] the serious class, that

LEGEND.—The mountain forests of Pastoria are inhabited, it is said, by Fairies, Sprites and Elves, who, like the Phantom Dancers of Germany, delight to entrap travelers into their realms and torment them with their mischievous antics. Having the power of transforming the spirit, they often, in their malicious gambols, give life to the newly dead. Statues, rocks and trees are seen fantastically moving in the forest, but it is only during the DAY they retain their fictitious existence; at the approach of NIGHT they resume their immobility.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

We have received files of Mexican journals to the [illegible] inst. An insurrectionary movement—in which Santa Anna, a former minister of Santa Anna, is implicated—was detected and suppressed at the [illegible]. The higher clergy continue to agitate, and endeavor to provoke civil war in the Republic. In the capital the Archbishop has gone so far as to refuse absolution to those who swear obedience to the new Constitution. No doubt, however, is entertained by respectable people but that the Government will triumph over its enemies, both lay and clerical. Many of the clergy have resolved to submit to the arbitrary decrees of the Ministry, or to follow his incendiary instructions to attempt rebellion against the civil authorities of the land. Though it is not believed that the pending controversy with Spain will lead to actual hostilities, yet the anticipation of such an event is [illegible] a more national spirit, by uniting opposite factions for the defence of their common country against the common enemy. It is stated that the British Chargé had presented his ultimatum. If its demands were not satisfied within nine days from the date of their presentation, he was determined to close the legation.

We have later news from Havana by the Philadelphia at this port, and the Isabel at Charleston. It is reported that neither the Spanish Government nor Gen. Concha would oppose the erection of a Protestant Church and an American Hospital near the City of Havana, if these privileges were made the subject of a formal request. The report comes [illegible] from a reliable source, and is worth the consideration of our Government. Preparations for the invasion of Mexico continue. The Marquis of [illegible], according to our correspondent, will accept the post of Commander-in-Chief. His subordinate generals have been already appointed. The African Slave trade seems to be in a flourishing condition, and is prosecuted, without let or hindrance, under the eyes of the authorities.

We have another contradiction of the reports of Indian massacres in Minnesota. Gen. SHERMAN has received a letter, dated the 15th inst., in which he positively contradicts the stories of the barbarities at Mankato, and stating that there is neither danger, nor a sign of hostility, among the Indian tribes in the territory. This is confirmed by other authorities.

Rev. Dr. BELLOWS last night delivered, at the Academy of Music, his promised Address on "The Relation of Public Amusements with Public Morality," &c. It will be found in full in our columns this morning.

The Annual Election of Trustees of the Society Library took place last night. A misunderstanding of a serious nature having arisen between the Board of Trustees for the past year and the Librarian, Mr. McMULLEN, a lively time was the result. There was a "Regular" ticket and a "Mozart" ticket. The result was not made known till shortly past midnight, when the tellers announced that the regular ticket was elected, with the exception of Mr. CHARLES H. STRONG, the late Treasurer, who was defeated by three votes, Mr. GULIAN C. VERPLANCK having 115 votes, while Mr. STRONG had 112. The list of elected Trustees will, therefore, read as follows: Charles R. Swords, R. L. Kennedy, Wm. H. Anthon, J. P. G. Foster, William Adams, Henry Van Schaick, George C. Anthon, Lewis C. Jones, Wolcott Gibbs, Robert Le Roy, Otis D. Swan, William J. Hoppin, Benjamin H. Field, George T. Elliot, G. C. Verplanck.

At the meeting of the Board of Aldermen, last evening, an opinion was received from the Corporation Counsel to the effect that any action of the Common Council with reference to a reorganization of the Departments, would not effect the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of any act of the Legislature. They concurred with the Comptroller, in devoting $1,000 to the widow of the late Office HAMMERSBROOK.

The Councilmen had a very stormy time last night. A resolution had been adopted that a committee of five be appointed to overhaul Comptroller FLAGG's books; but on one of many amendments to the proposition giving the committee authority to employ $1,000 worth of clerical help (which was lost finally), three members, Messrs. OTTERSON, KENNARD and JONES, refused to vote, though not excused. It ended in appointing a committee to report upon the case of the refractory members. The attempt to appropriate $10,000 for testing the validity of the new charter, was lost for want of a constitutional vote; afterwards, by a re-consideration, it was tabled.

At the Board of Governors of the Almshouse, last evening, a communication was received from ROBERT KING, one of the keepers of the Penitentiary, complaining that the Warden improperly converted to his own use a portion of the supplies, consisting of 625½ baskets of potatoes. The matter was referred to the Committee on Penitentiary [illegible]. A communication was received from a majority of school officers of Twelfth Ward as to the case of Miss JACKSON. They justify their action, and claim that they have legal control over the school. Another communication was received from three of the school officers, who believe that the usefulness of Miss JACKSON is at an end. They took no final action on the subject.

The examining up in the French Railroad Frauds case was commenced yesterday before U. S. Commissioner BETTS.

The case of Capt. RUSSELL, of the ship Caledonia, charged with cruelty on board, was held before U. S. Commissioner BENNEWELL yesterday. There was no evidence implicating the Captain, and he was discharged. A similar charge against the First and Second Mates will be investigated early in May.

The case of the schooner Merchant, the suspected slaver, and the examination of the crews of the Merchant and the John Bichback, will, it is understood, take place on Thursday, before U. S. Commissioner Morton.

The Anatomical Museum on Broadway, which has long shocked the modesty of citizens and strangers, by exhibiting the sight of all sorts of [illegible], departed its premises yesterday morning, [illegible] the building. The location is one-[illegible] and a more shame to go up in.

The investigation in the Sickles matter, before the Surrogate, was postponed yesterday, in order to permit counsel to devote their time to the preparation of their defence in the criminal case against Mrs. Cunningham, which, it was announced, would commence on Monday.

Mrs. BEECHER finished her thirty consecutive hours of walking in the Tabernacle last night. Capt. EVERDEN, who was present, at the conclusion made for a speech a $3 contribution to the box towards the "support of the three fatherless children" in whose behalf Mrs. BEECHER walked.

The New Excise Law.

The new License Law seems likely to measure the amount of common sense that still lingers in the community. Fanatical partisans on both sides of the Temperance question are determined to defeat its practical enforcement. The Liquor Dealers resist it because it restrains and limits their traffic;—the Delavan Prohibitionists resist it because it does not abolish the traffic altogether. Thus these two extreme factions play into each other's hands, and the interest of the public in the matter is sacrificed to the wranglings and contentions of two party cliques, equally selfish in their aims and equally unscrupulous in the means they adopt for attaining them.

One thing is clear:—If the matter of Temperance is to be left in their hands, the country must have one of two things,—absolute free trade in Liquor, or entire prohibition of every thing that can intoxicate:—and what is still worse, and equally certain, it can have neither of these long at a time, but must oscillate backward and forward from one to the other, as the popular majority may shift, or the chances and changes of political life may decide. The Executive Committee of the State Temperance Society have decided that they will "sustain nothing but prohibition,"—that they will not aid in enforcing any law which is only partially prohibitory,—and that they will permit the desolating tide of Intemperance to sweep over the land for "years, generations, or centuries, if necessary," rather than give their countenance to any law which seeks anything short of total and absolute prohibition. The Liquor Dealers throughout the State will cordially and zealously acquiesce in this decision, for it gives them full swing for a very indefinite time. If Mr. DELAVAN, indeed, had been acting as the President and Adviser of the Liquor Dealers' Association, he could not possibly have acted more directly in their interest, or done more to promote their special welfare as a class, than he has done by this proceeding.

Of course we do not imply or suppose that the motive of the Temperance Committee was thus to play into the hands of the liquor-selling interest, although their action leads directly to that result. They have been misled into this false and fatal step by the delusive and fatal spirit of partizanship. They are far more anxious to keep up a Temperance party than to promote temperance practices. Like all parties, they mistake their own selfish and ambitious aims for principle;—and steadiness in the pursuit of power they assume to be consistency in the support of measures. They betray the whole secret of their movement when they say, in the address from which we quoted yesterday, that they cannot aid in enforcing this law without making it their law, and weakening the strength of their party position just in proportion to the benefits and advantages which the law itself may produce. They will defeat and nullify the law if they can, in the hope that its failure may put the power of making another into their hands. And so the millions of the people of this great State are to suffer for years to come all the evils of an unchecked, unrestrained and unregulated traffic in intoxicating liquors, in order to bring the leaders of this party into political office. The contest, in fact, is the same which reappears in regard to every question—that between PARTY and the PUBLIC.

As a general thing, we are well aware, the active, energetic and zealous portion of the community are enrolled in the ranks of one party or the other,—and whatever is done of a public nature must be done by them. If that is so in this case,—if the great body of our people belong either to the ultra school of extreme Prohibitionists who will have that or nothing,—or to the party which makes free-trade in liquor its leading principle, then the new law will be a dead letter, for nobody will take the pains to attend to its enforcement. But if there is a large class of our people who care more for the public good than for party success,—who believe that whatever checks and diminishes intemperance does good to society, and that duty demands of every man that he should avail himself of every opportunity within his reach to render a service to his fellows,—then the law may be enforced in spite of the ominous coalition of Liquor Dealers and the Temperance Society against it.

We make no predictions, because we are by no means sanguine, as to the issue. Party Spirit has much more to do with the conduct of public affairs than Patriotism or Common Sense. Yet we shall hope for a result less discreditable to the intelligence and the sound, sober morality of the people of this State, than the one which the extreme partisans of Rum and Water have joined their forces to bring about.

Chaos Coming.

The municipal reformers of this magnificent City of ours have a way of not doing what they attempt, that would do credit to Tite Barnacle, Esq., of the Circumlocution Office. Last November they wanted to prevent the reelection of Mayor WOOD; they professed to believe that this was all-important to save the City from disgrace and ruin; they knew they had sufficient strength to enable them to accomplish their object with entire ease, by uniting their force on one candidate; and, therefore, they nominated four candidates and were defeated as a matter of course, by their adversary. But, Mayor WOOD having been elected by their petty squabbles and differences about trifles, they next set to work to oust him from his place by a change of the City Charter, and to prevent him from doing any more mischief by depriving him of all power over the police, and taking from his hands the nomination of certain local officers to which he was constitutionally entitled. They thus have invested the object of their machinations with the sanctity of persecution, and made him, to a degree, the champion of the people, in whose name he is uniting what many of them believe to be the despotic usurpation of the Legislature. He has the Common Council on his side, and thus far he seems to have the Judiciary also; and let the result of the injunctions which he has obtained be what it may, we have the sure prospect of having the whole machinery of our City Government in chaotic condition for a considerable time to come, and all the expenses of the struggle are to be defrayed out of the City treasury.

If Mayor WOOD continues to exercise his authority over the Police, as he is sure to do, it has been intimated that the new Commissioners will create and organize a distinct Police force, and then we may witness a fight between the two forces for the possession of the City. The new Commissioners have a decided advantage over the Mayor in one respect—the new law does not limit the number of policemen which they may appoint, while the Mayor is not only restricted in the number of his forces, but he has no authority over the neighboring Districts of Westchester, Kings County and Staten Island, where the new Commissioners may raise as large a force as they may consider necessary. There is a possibility of a grand fight, which will give the public something to talk about during the next three months. The new Commissioners may not feel themselves bound to yield up their functions at the command of a quo warranto issued by Judge ROOSEVELT. But we shall see what we shall see before long.

Part of the Central Park Commissioners were sworn into office yesterday, and there have been intimations that they, too, are to be served with a quo warranto, and that a similar course will be pursued towards the City Hall Commissioners, whenever they make an attempt to enter upon the discharge of their duties. We have not yet heard whether Mr. Commissioner EATON of the Street and Lamp Department, intends to resist the new Charter, or not, and hold on to his office until the expiration of the term for which he was elected, but it will be a remarkable instance of respect for the laws if he should quietly acquiesce in the act which deprives him of his place. In addition to the resistance to the new Charter and the Police bill by the Mayor and Common Council, it is said that the merchants intend to contest the legality of the new Port Wardens, so that there is every prospect of the lawyers having plenty of work on their hands, and of the public interests being left to take care of themselves just at that season of the year when efficient officers are most needed.

England and America.

Any one who has made a practice of perusing the orations of American Ministers at Lord Mayor's dinners in London, or of British Ministers in Washington, or who has listened to the oratory at Mr. PEABODY's Star and Garter dinners, or, in fact, at any festive gathering in which Englishmen and Americans find themselves in company, and feel called upon to make a speech, will perfectly understand us when we say that we are heartily sick of "fraternizing" in the ordinary acceptation of the term. We find it absolutely nauseating to be told anything more about the identity of origin and of language of the two peoples. We know very well that SHAKESPEARE is ours, and MILTON is ours, and JACK CADE and OWEN GLENDOWER are ours. We know that we drew a long bow at Cressy, and spurred very hard at Agincourt. We know that we extorted Magna Charta from John at Runnymede, and had our throats cut in the Wars of the Roses. All this, and a great deal more of the same sort of intelligence, is poured into our ears every day by benevolent individuals who are, no doubt, sincerely anxious that the two countries should be united in the bonds of harmony and good feeling, but who, we must say, are yearly becoming greater bores. The great truth that America and England are more closely united in all sorts of ways than any two countries in the world, is now so well established that we earnestly counsel all postprandial orators to leave the theme alone, and find some more interesting topic on which to expend their energies.

There is one branch of the subject, however, which has not been, by any means, so well explored, and on which a good deal of light might be thrown, if our journalists were a little more honest, and our politicians a little less knavish. We commend most cordially to the attention of all "representative men," whose tongues may be loosed by good food and good wine, the delusion so rife in this country, that the English are devoured by jealousy of us, and are forever plotting our detriment and damage. It is high time we got rid of this terrible incubus. It has as yet served no purpose on earth except to furnish a ladder for demagogues to climb into power, and to enable the unscrupulous and ambitious to trade in our fears and our hates. We were glad to find that Lord NAPIER addressed himself to this point, at the St. George's Dinner, with great force and felicity, and we hope his example may do something toward driving hackneyd compliments out of use. He said:

"GENTLEMEN: I have, since my arrival, sometimes observed an impression in the United States, that the development of this country is regarded with jealousy by England. Gentlemen, this is an erroneous opinion. [Cheers.] You will bear me out in the assertion that the last vestiges of former prejudice, founded on the animosities of two unhappy wars, are being very rapidly extinguished. The peaceful and legitimate expansion of the United States forms a matter of satisfaction and pride to every reasonable Englishman. That expansion forms the best resort and relief for our superabundant population; it forms the best market for our increasing industry; it is the triumph of our labor and our arts, of our language, our religion, and our blood. [Loud cheers.] No thoughtful Englishman can contemplate this unparalleled spectacle of future predominance without emotions of thankfulness and praise. No thoughtful foreigner can regard it without a sigh, because Providence has not reserved the future empire of the world for his own tongue and his own race." [Cheers.]

No one who possesses the slightest familiarity with the current opinions of English society upon American progress and institutions, can avoid feeling the truth and force of these remarks. Our absurd estimate of our own importance has prevented a great number of good people in this country from getting hold of the very obvious and simple truth, that it is possible for the same events to wear very different aspects on different sides of the Atlantic; that the importance of almost every incident in history is an importance purely relative, and that the less deeply our interests are involved, the less strongly are our passions roused. It is a common weakness of vain persons to suppose that the attention of the public is absorbed by their doings, and sayings, and looks. When Jones, the dry goods clerk, walks down Broadway in the morning, he fancies every one he meets is horrified by the annoying pimple which but yesterday sprang up on his nose, just as he imagines that his boots or his coat are the objects of universal admiration. There is just as much that is undignified and pitiful in conceitedly suspecting people of hating us, and plotting against us, as in supposing them of loving and admiring us. Both spring from over susceptibility to outward influences and want of self-confidence.

The War of Independence was, by no means, as stupendous an event for the English as for us. The most of the people in England knew and said little about it. Those who did were violently opposed to it. The ablest minds that England ever had spent his last breath in protesting against it. It was essentially a war begun and carried on by a corrupt oligarchy for base and corrupt motives.

It has left no impression except a purely historical one upon the minds of the English public. English school histories speak of it with marked disapprobation. English boys read of Bunker's Hill and Lexington with almost as hearty a sympathy for the Colonists as they ever feel for CLIVE on the field of Pussy, or NAPIER at Moodkee. Americans are not their natural enemies. They do not fight them on the play-ground. They are taught to recite PATRICK HENRY's speeches with fervor, and place WASHINGTON in the same category with HAMPDEN and FALKLAND and SYDNEY. No Englishman ever speaks of the father of his country to a foreigner without a touch of pardonable pride at the thought that he was of English origin and English habits, and might have been transferred to an English hunting-field or the English House of Commons, without affording any perceptible indication of the fact that he was not from top to toe an English gentleman. The United States have been tenfold more profitable to the Mother Country as an independent nation, than they could ever have been as dependent Colonies. Everybody in England knows of all this. If we owned the whole of the continent from Greenland to Cape Horn, no one would profit more by the extension of our dominion than England herself. Wherever the star-spangled banner waves, it waves over a good and rapidly increasing market for English goods. The whole tendency of the British Colonial policy for the last twenty years, has been to render the Colonies independent of her, or abandon them to their own devices. As far as self-government goes, Canada is to-day in as good a position as the United States, plus some thousands of soldiers for the defence of her frontiers, supported out of the British treasury. This certainly does not indicate much desire on the part of the Crown to repress our growth. To allow the process of assimilation to go on in one of her own Colonies lying on our frontier, without affording the slightest evidence of qualm or misgiving, is certainly not evidence of hatred of our institutions, or jealousy of our progress. We certainly cannot think at this moment of anything in the present state of public feeling more discreditable and more wounding to our pride, than the fact that the meanest stump-orator has only to mouth denunciations of Great Britain in bad English, to call down thunders of applause from assemblages of the freest and most enlightened people on the globe.

Street-Paving.

After the 1st of May the Croton Aqueduct Department will be empowered, under the new charter, to repair the gross neglect which has been so long permitted, in relation to the condition of the pavements of this metropolis. A bureau of pipes, sewers and pavements will be under the direction of the Board, which will be intrusted henceforth with the care of piercing sewers and drains and laying the pavements. We fear that there are but few streets in the City, which would not be able, if stones could cry out, to tell a separate tale of corruption of their own, indicative of the manner in which the treasury has been plundered, under the auspices of the Department of Supplies and Repairs and the contractors who have heretofore had them in charge. These abuses ought all to be remedied, and the public should watch carefully that the newly constituted authorities do their duty.

An instance of the disgraceful manner in which contracts have been made and executed, under the expiring dynasty, is afforded in the case of Mr. PETTIGREW, who secured from the Common Council, over a year ago, the quarter-of-a-million job of laying Chatham-street and the Bowery with Belgian pavement. The work was left off last Fall, near Pearl-street, in consequence of the appointment of a Special Committee, by the Board of Aldermen, to investigate the nature of the labor already performed. It was then well understood that the terms of the contract had not been complied with—that blocks of stone smaller than the stipulated size had been used, and that they rested only on a gravel ground, whereas the agreement was that there should be a foundation of sand one foot in depth. This Special Committee never reported! Nothing has ever been known of their real or supposed proceedings, and the only conclusion which remains is to suppose a collusion between its members and Mr. PETTIGREW, equally discreditable to them all. In any case, in view of the approaching dissolution of the old Departments, Mr. PETTIGREW recommenced his work a few days ago, and has since then hurried it forward with indecent and neglectful rapidity. He will be paid, we suppose, by the City, and the Treasury will be fairly mulcted of a sum sufficient to have laid the whole of the streets properly, which he will leave uneven and a fit subject for the immediate action of the Croton Department.

The chaos which has long reigned on the line of the Canal-street extension is another scandalous instance of mismanagement. The contract for paving it, from Centre-street to its junction with East Broadway, with the Belgian blocks, was awarded, a great while ago, to Mr. CHARLES G. WATHBURY, at the unprecedentedly low price of one dollar and thirty-nine cents the square yard. The contract not having been confirmed by the Common Council until the middle of last Winter, the contractor could only commence operations this Spring. Thus, a crowded portion of the City has been blocked up and rendered impassable, and the work is now going on—we trust efficiently—but at a most auspicious moment, just when the Croton Department are about to assume the charge which has been so long left unattended to.

The frequent practice of contractors, hitherto, has been to dig up the old pavement, stir the gravel, and relay the stones just as they were before. As a consequence, the first rain, or indeed the passage of the first train of heavy carts, has been all-sufficient to put the streets into as bad or worse a condition than [illegible] the job has remained to be done over [illegible] to enrich once, twice, or a dozen times the same scoundrels who were guilty of violating their obligations in the first instance. This we hope the Croton Department will correct, and that, under a new régime, we shall witness reform, which is most important.

Believing the Best Route—The Sound Steamers to Land Up Town.

The East River has become the crowded Broadway of our port, and the perils to which passengers crossing it are exposed, particularly at points between the Battery and the Navy-Yard, are daily getting to be more complicated and dangerous. This watery avenue which separates as from the Cities of Brooklyn and Williamsburg needs, like our dusty Broadway, to be relieved of everything that unnecessarily obstructs its free navigation, embarrasses business on its shores, or, more than all, puts in jeopardy any of the one hundred thousand Ferry passengers who daily pass between our City and Long Island.

The most dangerous obstruction to a free use of the East River, both for passenger transits and for business along its shores, and the one which has become a matter of general complaint, is the large steamers which ply between New-York and ports on Long Island Sound making their landings at the lower part of the City. Six large steamers running to and from Hartford, New-Haven and Bridgeport, make their landings on the East River near Peck-Slip; while six large steamers running on the Boston routes by way of Norwich, Stonington and Fall River pass down the entire length of the East River, double the Battery and make their landing on the North River side of the City. In addition to these, several large freight propellers, plying between New-York and various cities on the New-England coast, as far East as Portland in the State of Maine, are daily passing up and down the East River on the way to or from their landing places.

It is the large size of these boats and the high speed at which most of them are run that makes their daily passage through the East River exceedingly perilous to life and property. There is a law which forbids steamers to be propelled at a higher rate of speed than ten miles an hour, in any of the waters of our harbor. But this, like many other of our municipal laws, has become a dead letter; and the Boston boats may be seen on any afternoon, about 5 o'clock, straining through the East River at a speed of fifteen to eighteen miles an hour, while constantly thronging about their path are the Brooklyn and Williamsburg ferry-boats loaded with passengers;—schooners, sloops and lighters loaded with merchandise; steam-tugs with their tows; besides the smacks, skiffs and other small craft that are ever afloat on the river. When the tide in the East River is at the second quarter of the flood, the velocity of the current is 422 feet per minute, or nearly five miles per hour. The speed of the large Boston boats when passing up the river on this tide cannot be less than twenty miles an hour; a speed so hazardous on such a crowded thoroughfare that all the ferry-boats on either side must stay their trips, to keep out of the way of these rushing monsters, or continue them only by imperiling their passengers' lives. Should a railroad track be laid through Broadway, and a locomotive be driven over it, every morning and afternoon, at the rate of twenty miles an hour, the promenaders on that avenue would probably protest not only that their rights were most unjustly infringed, but that their lives were placed in most deadly peril. And yet these citizens would have no greater cause of complaint than those Brooklyn ferry passengers now have, exposed as they are, to be run over and crushed into the river every morning and afternoon by those ponderous and swift-rushing steamers.

But these boats not only place lives and property in jeopardy on the East River; they embarrass commerce in many ways. The Harbor Masters assure us that it is not safe to move a ship in that narrow stream, when one of these steamers is expected to pass; not only because the high speed at which these steamers run puts it out of the power of their pilots to check or control them in case the ship gets in their way, and a collision becomes imminent; but the long deep swell which they create in the river makes it very difficult to handle the ship, often tearing her from her fastenings, unless these be very strongly secured. Frequently the Commonwealth, the Metropolis, and the Plymouth Rock, heavy boats of more than 2,000 tons each, running on the Boston lines, will pass up East River abreast of each other, going at full speed on the flood tide, and monopolizing the whole width of the stream. The great wave which they make washes both shores, and very often tears lighter and smaller crafts from their moorings, while every ship lying across the end of the piers is liable to be badly chafed by the wash.

We are at loss to find any reason why our City authorities should allow the Sound steamers to obstruct or monopolize the navigation of the East River any longer. On the other hand the fact, which can be easily authenticated, that, by their daily passages through the crowded portions of this narrow stream, business is embarrassed and lives and property placed in great jeopardy—is a good and sufficient reason why they should be compelled to leave the lower part of the East River and make their landings somewhere above Corlear's Hook.

It has been volunteered as a reason for allowing these boats to land where they have landed for many years past, that they bring to the City a large quantity of freight consigned to commission houses located below the Park, or destined for shipment on Southern boats, whose landings are on the North River, near their own. These boats, however, bring no more freight to the City than the numerous sailing packets bring from the same Eastern ports, which do not find it necessary for their business to pass round into the North River to make a landing; nor do they bring any more freight than the several railroads communicating with the East, which do not find it necessary to run their freight cars down to Bowling-green, to accommodate their consignees.

Besides, the piers at which these boats now land are very inconveniently located both for arriving and departing passengers. They are located in one of the most filthy and crowded sections of the City, difficult of access, and far removed from stage routes and from all those hotels and shops of the metropolis which every [illegible] to the centre of the City [illegible] a pier like this [illegible] large vessels any daily [illegible] which to load or [illegible] piers are needed for [illegible] purposes, that the [illegible] passenger boats which can be [illegible] in some other section of the City, [illegible] the foot of Fourteenth-street on the East River.

All they have to do is to [illegible] Academy of Music or some other [illegible] few weeks, hire a company of actors, and [illegible] a series of leading parts; in addition to this, it will be necessary to keep up a [illegible] correspondence in the daily papers, in [illegible] date at the whole herde of critics, and [illegible] the same in all the principal cities. By this process, which will cost but a few thousand dollars, it is possible to achieve a popularity that may last nearly nine days. Some ladies have become quite as popular as Mrs. McMANUS, with much less trouble and expense. NIGHTINGALE, for instance; and Mrs. [illegible], quilted countrywoman, Mrs. [illegible] more popularly known by merely putting on a pair of pantaletts and wearing her petticoats shorter than other women. Mrs. McManus may congratulate herself on being the most popularly known lady in the United States; but, overtaking Miss Dix in eminence has cost her, and the very fame which it is likely to last, we could not conscientiously advise any lady to follow her example. Ina Pfeiffer has become tolerably popular by going everywhere, and a lady is now in the enjoyment of a reputation in the Tabernacle by the simple process of walking thirty miles in as many hours.

We have now the pleasure to record another donation from the same public-spirited citizen of twenty thousand dollars; a similar amount has been received from him by the Trustees of the Society. This sum makes a gift of more than fifty thousand dollars which has been contributed by Mr. DREW to the philanthropic cause of colonization."

The fund formerly on hand, [illegible] paid by new members, and the [illegible] tax levied on all the members, [illegible] of over $800,000. With this sum they think a [illegible] long and fierce battle may be waged.

In the Second Ward there are 111 [illegible] liquor shops, distributed as follows:

Liberty-street	4	Spring-street	[illegible]
Maiden-lane	10	Water-street	[illegible]
John-street	[illegible]	Gold-street	[illegible]

Beekman-street	10	Pearl-street	[illegible]
Spruce-street	[illegible]
Peck-slip	6
Total	[illegible]

Beside the places enumerated, there are many other localities where liquor is sold at wholesale. In Fulton Market there are eleven places where liquor is kept. Ann-street abounds more than any other in liquor shops. On this street, between Nassau-street and Broadway, there are twelve places where liquor is retailed. One place on this street—the old "Smith's Hotel"—has lately closed up. On the door an announcement of a Sheriff's sale of the furniture of the house is posted.

The total number of liquor sellers living in the Second Ward does not exceed forty. By the same [illegible] cannot be, therefore, over two places licensed in this ward for selling liquor!

THE TROUBLES CONTINUE.—Since Mr. FRANCE raised the interest on Revenue Bonds to 7 per cent, money has been comparatively [illegible] ing, into the Chamberlain's hands. The confidence has been made good, and there is a surplus [illegible] perhaps, to meet the warrants already drawn, [illegible] the latter have not all been paid. Money must be tight indeed when City warrants paper is hawked and nibbled at by hungry speculators. The Chamberlain will continue to pay warrants, as they stand, in the order of their date, unless Mr. FRANCE will probably give no heed to the calls for warrants hereafter, unless he knows there is money enough in the Treasury to pay them.

BY
ALLOPATHY, HOMOEOPATHY, WATER-CURE,
AND MEDICATED INHALATION, PRACTICALLY REVIEWED
BY
ROBERT HUNTER, M. D.,
Consulting Physician for Pulmonary Diseases, 1059 Broadway, New-York.)

We have, perhaps, dwelt too long on European writers. If so, it has been because their works are the text-books of the colleges of this country. There are comparatively few works on consumption written in America. But let us read these in review as representing more fully and fairly the American view of the case. We have before us the splendid work of the late Dr. Swett, of this City, published some three years ago. Dr. Swett wrote for many years one of the physicians of the New-York Hospital, and at the time of his death held the responsible trust of a professorship in the New-York University. That he was a man of sterling ability, none, who knew him, will call in question. Had he left us no other proof of his indefatigable zeal in the pursuit of his profession than his "Treatise on the Diseases of the Chest," he would have been amply sufficient to earn him a high place in the temple of fame. Well then we may safely take Dr. Swett's work as a fair exponent of the practice of the profession in this country. In answering the question: Is phthisis a curable disease? he observes: "the general impression in the medical profession is that a patient with phthisis is doomed to death." (P. XIV.) Why does this impression exist? Simply, because almost every case results in death! "If," continues he, "those cases only are considered, in which the disease is strongly marked, and which is so advanced in its progress that the diagnosis is easy, this opinion is, on the whole, well founded; yet even under these circumstances, unexpected recoveries take place." (P. XIV.) What does this mean but that if the disease is sufficiently advanced to be detected the case is hopeless, or if recovery does take place it is an "unexpected" result, which could not be anticipated to follow the treatment employed. It may be well to state, that Dr. Swett is a strong advocate of the pathology of the disease, but honest enough to confess that the profession, to the present, has not discovered the secret of curing it. "I admit," says he, "as all must do, that phthisis is a most fatal disease, and that the prognosis is always unfavorable!" What does he mean by the term prognosis? He means that the opinion we must form of the chances of the patient to recover is "always unfavorable." We cannot look for any expect his recovery from following any plan of treatment employed or advised by Dr. Swett. If recovery should follow such treatment, it is a result which is "unexpected." Which of the readers of the Daily Times will have the bravery to submit to this treatment and run the gauntlet for life? This may seem a harsh expression, but is it not literally true? What else can it be called than running the gauntlet for life to submit to a plan of treatment, the very advocates and champions of which are themselves compelled to confess is "empirical, incert. and unsatisfactory." (Billings.)

After considering the general details of the regimen to be observed by physicians in the treatment of their consumptive cases, Dr. Swett passes to the consideration of the virtues of the remedies which are commonly employed in this disease. The following summary will show the reader how feeble are the chances of recovery from pursuing the best course known to the profession:

"I willingly admit that no remedy has as yet been discovered which appears to exert any specific influence upon tubercles, either in preventing their development or in promoting their cure. Antiphlogistics, for instance, have all had their day of imaginary success, and all been forgotten. Cod liver oil, the newest (1853) popular remedy, is destined to experience the same fate. It has not, in my opinion, any specific influence on consumption; it has not, in my experience, performed any wonderful cures. * * It is a good nutritive, and a valuable tonic, and I think it very probable that other kinds of oil equally well prepared, may exert the same beneficial influence." (p. 309.)

A little more than two years have passed since this opinion, in regard to cod-liver oil, was expressed by Dr. Swett, and now his is the universal opinion of all physicians who have carefully noted its effects. On the question of treating consumptive patients, Dr. Swett remarks:—

"Those practitioners who regard the deposit of tubercles as one of the effects of inflammatory action, and who mistake the symptoms of irritation which they create for those of inflammation, have been led to adopt a practice in the early stages of the disease which is fatal to the welfare of the patient. Venesection (blood-letting) has been resorted to, and repeated, from time to time, and leeches have been applied to the chest, and low diet recommended, with authority, with the vain hope of removing the cause of the disease. * * A case came under my notice about two years since, which will impress upon your minds the consequences of the free depletion which is sometimes adopted. A young man of moderately strong constitution was attacked with the usual symptoms of consumption. For two months the disease did not appear to progress with much activity. He was then attacked with pulmonary hemorrhage. He was bled freely from the arm three times at short intervals, after the hemorrhage ceased. He was bled again and again, for fear the hemorrhage would return! It is probable that the loss of blood from hemorrhage, and from twice-repeated bleedings, had induced the reaction—the throbbing pulse which attends anæmia! He was next advised by his physicians to pass the Winter in the West Indies. He came as far as this City from Vermont, where he had been ill, and I was called to see him. I found him as pale as a corpse, only able to sit up for a short time, and with a very feeble and rapid pulse. I did not think he could live more than twenty-four hours. By the use of stimulants he rallied a little, and lived nearly a week." (p. XII.)

Here we have an example of that cruelty and ignorance which, alas! too many physicians manifest, in sending persons in the last stage of hopeless consumption to warm climates. In the incipient stage their temper with the disease by palliatives, and when it has become incurable they shuffle off the responsibility by sending the dying invalid on a long, fatiguing, and expensive journey. The following table, constructed by Dr. Benton, of Madeira, will show that this practice is not confined alone to American practitioners. Madeira is a favorite European Winter resort for consumptives.

Patients arrived with tubercles large 50.
(Died on the Island 20.
(Still remaining... 4.

So that more than one-half never lived to see the Spring or to return to their friends. They died far from home, among strangers, and deprived of all those consolations which tend to lessen the heavy burden of our afflictions in the last sad moments of life. And for what did they deprive themselves of these? To satisfy the intuitive conception of their physicians. Their fate was sealed before they set out upon their journey. If they physicians did not know this they must have been ignorant; and if they did, and still persisted in advising such a course, the motive becomes far less excusable, and amounts to a crime. But to continue with our summary, Dr. Swett observes, p. XIV.:

"There is a class of remedies called expectorants, which are much employed in the treatment of consumption, but which, I think, should be banished almost altogether from the treatment of the disease. Many physicians are in the habit of prescribing to their consumptive patients, as a matter of course, a cough mixture, containing a variety of expectorant medicines, combined with more or less opium. * * But what influence can these remedies have upon a disease like phthisis? They may quiet the cough for a time—the opium they contain will do this—and thus deceive a hopeful patient with the idea that his condition is really improving. But the long-continued use of these remedies is sure to irritate and to disturb the digestive functions, without benefiting the lungs. Many are the unhappy victims who have bitterly regretted the use of these remedies, when they look back on the sad experience of the disease from which they are suffering."

Dr. Swett next sums up the preceding observations on treatment, and lays bare the poverty of the resources of the usual practice. We particularly recommend this paragraph to the attentive perusal and calm reflection of all consumptive persons:

"In the early stage, let the patient seek the open air and enjoy such exercise as his symptoms will permit. Let your patient adopt a mild but nutritious diet, and preserve carefully the tone and healthy condition of the digestive organs. Use as little medicine as possible, and only to correct certain symptoms which may be easily removed. Remember, there is no specific remedy in phthisis. In the advanced stage, as the powers of digestion fail, they may require the support of tonics and stimulants. Local irritation will require direct means to check its progress. Opiates, in small doses, is the best means you possess. Diarrhœa must be controlled by opium and mild astringents. Night sweats must be checked by mineral acids, and by the aid of astringents; and, finally, the close of life must be solaced by simply attending to the immediate comforts of the patient." (p. 317.)

Dr. GIRNIER, of Philadelphia, holds a similar doctrine. He regards the medical treatment of this disease to consist of an effort to "remove accidental complications or conditions of the body which favor the growth of tubercles, rather than by acting upon the tubercular affection itself." We are, in his opinion, to treat the symptoms and leave the cause undisturbed. We are not to strive to remove the tubercles, or to prevent their softening. The tubercles are to be permitted to pass from the first to the second, and from the second to the last stage, without our making the least effort to get rid of them. From the first to the last the whole treatment is one of palliation. The utmost that can be expected to result from it is, to prolong the life of the patient a few weeks, or, at most, a few months. We doubt that it even does this. On the contrary, we believe it more frequently hastens the death than prolongs his life. Certain it is that the opiates and expectorants that are given by our physicians destroy the tone of the stomach and hasten the emaciation. But be this as it may, what do these confessions prove? They prove that no medical man, guided by the books or the colleges, can promise those laboring under consumption more than palliation. Let this be ever remembered. Let none delude themselves into the belief that because their disease is in its incipient stage—only just commencing—or their lungs but "very slightly affected," they are going to get well, unless the advice of their physician, "a specialist," says Dr. Swett, that there is no remedy for the patient, and again, the expectation and hope disappointed which respecting a cure, never entertained, never expected, never hoped for, never dreamed of, never thought of, never even remotely suggested, or even remotely hinted at, by the physician, who prescribes these remedies." (p. 308.) If their use neither is permitted from the patient themselves, nor have even been suggested by the physician, why should the patient continue to take such remedies? The reason is, that Dr. Swett adds, in his preface, hoping to give, in his little work, a good impression of the author, and to secure a good sale, "the author has some conscientious scruples about giving to the patient, this (Wednesday) afternoon, at 3 o'clock, from the Church of the Ascension, Clinton-st.

NEW-YORK CITY.

The Probate Court—Postponement of Proceedings before the Surrogate.

TUESDAY, April 28.

The morning counsel in the matter of the claim of [illegible] R. Commissioner, to a widow's portion of the estate of the late HARVEY BURDELL, appeared before the Surrogate, pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. [illegible], on the part of the claimant, applied for a postponement on the ground that he had been informed by the District-Attorney that the principal witness in the Criminal Court would be examined on Monday, and it was necessary that his client should devote all the time in the interval at his disposal to the preparation of their defence. He stated on the announcement by the Surrogate made the day last, to the effect that if such a contingency arose he would postpone further proceedings in the matter before him until the termination of the criminal case.

Mr. [illegible] strenuously opposed the application on the ground, first, that he had not received any communication as that stated to have been done from the District-Attorney; and second, because three or four witnesses from Baltimore were expected to be in the 12 o'clock train, and, as a matter of convenience to them, and to save further expense on the part of his client, it was but proper that they should be examined. But further than this time to be appropriated to their examination, he would not oppose the motion.

After considerable discussion,

The Surrogate stated that he was very reluctantly inclined to adjourn the case, but he must stand by his word to the letter. As soon as the criminal trial was ended he would notify counsel on both sides of the fact, when he should be prepared to resume these proceedings, and in the meantime would order the attendance of the witnesses expected to-day to be paid out of the Burdell estate, irrespective of the result of the criminal investigation.

RIVAL SO THE CROTON.—A few months ago Mr. [illegible] Rayner, of the well-known Broadway Bar [illegible] stormed at the size of his annual bill for Croton water, which was near $1,000, and had an artesian well bored in a vault at the rear of his premises. He now supplies him with water at the rate of twenty-five gallons per minute, which he uses for all the purposes of his saloon and hotel, except drinking. The taste of the water is limy in a slight degree, but we are assured that when iced it passes well for Croton. The well is about eighty feet deep, and twenty inches in diameter. The water flows nearly to the top, and is thence raised to all parts of the building by steam power. There are other artesian wells in this City, principally connected with sugar refineries. The low temperature of the water from such sources in Summer renders it especially valuable in certain chemical processes. The success of Mr. TAYLOR may induce some of our hotel proprietors to sink other wells of the same kind, in view of the large annual expense for Croton. The bill of the St. Nicholas, for example, was $2,000 last year.

SHOCKING RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—FREDERICK [illegible], a clerk whose residence is in Twenty-[illegible]-street, met with a shocking accident yesterday morning, on the Hudson River Railway, in Canal-street. Anxious to get down town to his place of business as speedily as possible, he attempted to leap upon the front platform of one of two freight-cars which were passing along. In so doing he slipped and fell between the cars upon the track. The wheels of the cars passed over both legs, and crushed them in a shocking manner. He was removed to the City Hospital, where his injuries were at once pronounced fatal. His family were sent for, and were soon by his bedside. Mr. BURNHAM is 32 years of age. He was alive at 9 o'clock last evening, suffering intensely.

COMMUTA.—Over the Peck-slip and Grand-street ferries, the Company have notice that parties may commute on knockdowns—five dollars for a foot passenger for six months, and three dollars for each person under 12 years of age. By ways the Eastern District of Brooklyn and East-Twin shown ferry-boats, ply on which passengers can commute to advantage. The price of coal continues so high yet, that the Union Ferry Company is unable to gratify its desire to accommodate by any return to the old rates or to permit commutation. A man who lives in Williamsburg and does business in New-York can cross twice each way daily for $10 a year. If he lives on the Heights he must pay for the same rides over a ferry not one quarter as wide very nearly $60.

☞ St. Patrick's Cathedral pews were rented for the year last Monday. About three quarters of the pews were rented, at prices ranging from $60 for the choice, $14 in the middle aisle, near the altar, to $8 for those nearest the entrance. There are 210 pews in the church, 16 of which are reserved for the Sunday School, near the entrance. A large number of the congregation hire seats only in these pews. There are seven seats in each pew of the centre aisle, and five seats in the pews of the side aisles. $12 is the price asked for a single seat in the choice pews.

☞ CHARLES GUDNEY has got the contract for the paving Maiden-lane and Cortlandt-street with iron at $1 25 per square yard for paving, and 39 cents for [illegible].

LADIES' UNION AID.—The new house of the Ladies' Union Aid Society, an institution for the care of the sick and indigent members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was dedicated on Monday by Bishop JAMES. The building occupies three lots of ground in Forty-second-street, 150 feet east of Eighth-avenue, on the north side. It is 62 feet long, 66 feet wide, four stories high. The rooms are arranged to accommodate twenty one hundred persons. A chapel, reception and [illegible] rooms are provided. The entire cost will be about $35,000.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

CAPTURE OF AN ALLEGED SHOP-LIFTER—SOLD FRO CHANGES.

A man calling himself Lewis Gemell, aged 27, a native of Ireland, and a peddler by occupation, was yesterday arrested by officer Clark of the Reserve Corps, and brought before Justice OSBORNE at the Police Court, on a charge of shoplifting. From the statements made for the prosecution it appears that of late he has been "operating" most boldly. On Tuesday last, it is charged, he and three other men entered the store of Fuselmer, Millikan & Townsend, No. 36 Bowery, under pretence of purchasing some goods, and stole therefrom some valuable goods. The clerk in charge pursued him a long distance, knocked him down, and took from him the stolen property, but did not succeed in effecting his arrest. His accomplices made good their escape also.

He is further charged that yesterday morning Gemell took hold his hand at the game of shoplifting. With the other men he entered the store of Van Wagener, Tucker & Co., No. 4 College-place, representing that they wished to purchase some broadcloths. The clerk took him to the fourth floor, to exhibit the goods asked for. One of the other men followed, and the third man remained upon the first floor with the porter. After inspecting a great many varieties, Gemell said he would not purchase just then, but would call again in the afternoon. The strangers then left—one for Chatham, and the other three alone upon the third floor, rather hastily. They had been gone but a moment when it was discovered that two pieces of silk and a piece of satin, valued at $270, had been stolen. In pursuit of the man Gemell was arrested by officer Clark, of the Reserve Corps. He was locked up for trial.

DESPERATE ASSAULT—A FRIGHTFUL MORTALITY.

Michael Clarke, employed as a watchman at the Brooklyn [illegible] in Fourteenth-street, is now lying at the point of death, at his boarding house, in Forty-second-street, from the effects of a terrible beating given him a few nights ago by a party of ruffians, who followed him home for that purpose. He has since been lying in a partially delirious state, and the physicians attending him are of opinion that he cannot recover. The post-mortem examination of the dying man will be made today.

ASSAULT BY BOYSTERS.

[illegible] Station, the railroad switch-tender at the foot of Grand-street and Newtown-creek, was set upon yesterday morning by three men, who had lain behind the fence, and struck him with it several times. He drew upon his assailants a pistol loaded only with powder and wadding, and discharged the contents at one of them. The fellows then caused their heels, and Martin heaved into a passing cart to avoid further violence. When he had ridden some distance he met a Tenth Ward policeman, with whom he returned to the place where the assault had been committed. One of the assailants only remained, and he was found to be suffering considerably from the discharge of Martin's pistol. This fellow gave his name as Charles Dougherty. He was conducted to the Police Station, and yesterday the matter was brought for examination before Justice WOOD, at the Essex Market Police Court, who held Dougherty to answer.

ATTEMPT TO PASS BAD MONEY.

Two boatmen, named James H. Reed and William H. Powell, were arrested Monday evening in the Third Ward, charged with attempting to pass two counterfeit bills on the Williamsburg City Bank, offered to brewsters. They were taken yesterday before Justice OSBORNE, at the First District Police Court, and committed for examination.

ALLEGED BEGGLEMENT AT THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL.

Virgil Whitcomb, one of the proprietors of the St. Nicholas Hotel, appeared on Monday before Justice FLANDREAU, at the Jefferson Market Police Court, and deposed that he had probable cause to suspect, and did suspect, that on the 20th inst. bank bills of the value of $50, the property of Treadwell, Whitcomb & Co., of the St. Nicholas Hotel, was taken, stolen and carried away by Charles Brown, from the fact that he (the deponent) was informed by Dennis Kelly, that on leaving the drawer he counted $23 in bank bills, leaving said Brown in charge, and on his return found but $87 left, instead of the original $23. The accused party pleaded not guilty, and was locked up for trial in default of $500 bail.

FROM WHOM WAS IT STOLEN?

John Grossett and Christopher Plunkett were seen to run away about 12 o'clock Monday night, from an open lot in the Twentieth Ward. Two policemen, Garbe and Sheridan, thinking the movement suspicious, gave chase and captured them. A bottle of cologne water and a few kegs were found upon them. On going to the lot the officers found there a trunk which had been broken open and rifled. Grossett and Plunkett were taken yesterday before Justice FLANDREAU and temporarily committed. The police say they are bad fellows. Who owns the trunk?

ROBBERY.

WM. Monagal of No. 101 Morgan-street, Jersey City, went into a barber's shop in Liberty-street, this City, on Monday evening, with (as he declares) $175 in his breast pocket. He got shaved, and when he put his hands in his pockets to pay he discovered that he had been robbed. He caused the proprietor of the barber's shop to be arrested and held for examination.

Fires.

IN FIFTH-STREET—SUPPOSED BURGLARY AND INCENDIARISM.

A fire broke out about 5 o'clock yesterday morning, in the dwelling of Dr. SUMMS, No. 611 Fifth-street. The Doctor was absent in Philadelphia, but his family were asleep upon the second floor of the house. When aroused by the alarm, they attempted to go to the basement where the fire originated, to get $1,000 from a drawer in that part of the house, but were prevented by the flames. The firemen and police soon put the fire out. The damage to the building and furniture is estimated at $500. The drawer which contained the thousand dollars was destroyed. It is supposed that a burglar entered the premises, and having stolen the money, then fired the house.

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR CONSUMPTION.

ANDREWS' Liquid Iodine or Pure Iodine Water, indorsed as such by Dr. JAMES R. CHILTON, Professor JAS. C. BOOTH, and other eminent chemists, is now admitted to be the only reliable remedy for Consumption. Iodine only produces its wholesome effects when given uncombined with anything but water. But Chemistry for years held it to be insoluble in water, and so gave it dissolved with mercury, alcohol, potassium. But, all these mixtures injure. Iodine and water alone cure. Dr. HENRY ANDREWS has, at length, discovered the secret of making a perfectly aqueous solution, and hence his extraordinary success. Hence he cures, without fail, a variety of diseases, such as palsy, consumption, and scrofula, that had been considered almost, if not quite incurable, besides furnishing a certain, easy, economical and specific remedy for diseases of the heart, liver complaint, fever and ague, bilious disorders of all kinds, and those morbid conditions of the system arising from a depraved state of the blood. His Iodine Water is sold at $1 a bottle by ANDREWS & FOSDICK, No. 9 Second-avenue and No. 562 Broadway; C. H. RING, No. 192, and BARNES & PARK, No. 504 Broadway; Mrs. HAYES, Brooklyn, and all druggists.

LONG ISLAND.

ANOTHER INJUNCTION TALKED OF.—When the Nassau Water Company first contracted to bring water into Brooklyn, it was said by the opponents of the work that the Commissioners contemplated under that arrangement, never would be allowed to proceed. Now that an act has passed appointing the Commissioners, it is rumored that the parties making this statement intend to obtain an injunction to restrain the Water Commissioners from acting, as soon as they swear in. This they have not as yet done. The application for the injunction will be made upon the ground that the appointment of Commissioners by the Legislature is unconstitutional.

TUESDAY, April 28—P. M.

The business in Exchange for the steamer Arabia, sailing from this port to-morrow, closed up at previous quotations, 109¾@110; the business transactions of the day for ready money sterling at 109¾@¾. Some three-day sight bills were done at 110¾ ₩ cent.; Francs were 5.18¾@5.17½; on the North of Europe the rates generally cheaper. The sterling market closed barely steady. The additional engagements of Bullion for this opportunity since yesterday, makes the shipment about one million of dollars. The income from California by the steamer Illinois, now due at this port, is telegraphed, via New-Orleans, $1,500,000. The Discount market continues easy, and some of the Wall-street Banks are seeking prime short paper at 7 ₩ cent. One or two of the Foreign Banking-houses called in some demand loans to-day, preliminary to the sailing of the steamer, and this caused some more inquiry for money on the Street, though generally the Broker's were easy. The Sub-Treasury received $282,481; disbursed $208,078, and held at the close $14,551,808.

The Stock Market again indicated an upward tendency on most part of the list, and the stiffness in Illinois Central, Cleveland and Toledo, Reading, New-York Central and Southern Michigan was quite decided, and the amount of Stock recently withdrawn from the control of the speculators against the market, in the case of the Illinois Central and Toledo, has had the effect of advancing prices about 3@6 ₩ cent. within a few days. Illinois brought 134 freely to-day, and Toledo 69¾ ₩ cent. cash, and the deliveries on previous contracts not very easy at these rates. The Score were not, perhaps, prepared for so sudden a turn in prices, much less for the reduced supply of cash stock at command on the Toledo books after the reopening of the transfers on Saturday. The same parties calculated on a return of Illinois Stock from England, on the announcement of the late arrangement for subdividing the capital; instead of which each packet brings fresh orders for the Stock, while bona fide holders at home are not anxious sellers. The experience in both stocks to-day, has only gone to confirm what has been repeatedly stated in this column of late, that while the work of defamation and bold gambling is going on in Wall-street, the public are gradually and surely increasing their investments, at the reduced prices, in nearly every Railway stock on the list. The party who have grown bolder by success in pocketing large differences against the Bull speculators are now sellers at the lowest figures of the New-York and Erie, and Milwaukee and Mississippi, and continue to sell on time, Cleveland and Toledo, and other stocks which their operations have well nigh worked into a corner. Yet the Certificates of Erie, withdrawn from the Street since the reopening of the books yesterday are equal to 2,000 shares, and the actual transfers of Milwaukee, for the past month, trifling in themselves, have been against the Brokers. Notwithstanding a recent publication put forth for effect to the contrary, the amount of this stock inscribed on the New-York books, is the same as on the 1st of April, or within less than 50 shares of it. No new stock has come from the West, and little or none has issued, as far we are advised, for inscription anywhere outside the control of the Board of Directors, since the last report. Of the Capital then reported, say 32,650 shares, 11,500 shares were and are under the control of the Company as collateral to the City of Milwaukee Bonds and Farm Mortgage Bonds negotiated for the Road. Of the remaining 21,150 shares, 15,796 shares stood on the New-York books, March 31, and 15,840 shares stand inscribed to-day. The market this afternoon closed generally steady, Erie being the principal exception. The fluctuations of the day were:

New-York and Erie	42¾@¾@¾@¾@41¾@41¾@42¾
Cleveland and Toledo	69¾@¾@¾@¾@¾@¾
New-York Central	87¾@¾@¾
Southern Michigan	63¾@¾@¾@¾
Reading	82¾@¾@¾@¾
Illinois Central	124¾@¾@¾@¾@124

The sales of the day were quite large, full 30,000 shares, including the operations on the Street. During the ten business days the Erie books were closed, the amount of contracts made for and falling due on the reopening was equal to two-thirds whole capital, and yesterday about 10,000 active shares, in the names of brokers, were put through the extraordinary process of 600 different transfers from broker to broker, and made to settle 68,000 shares in contracts! The old and experienced Transfer Clerk, Mr. ORTS, with all his experience, was not able to leave his desk until long after the regular hour to which transfers are ordinarily permitted. And yet the bona fide holders of nearly ninety thousand shares of the capital were no party to this scene.

The Cotton Circular of Messrs. NEILL BROTHERS, prepared for the Arabia, remarks:

RECEIPTS.—In our circular of the 18th of February, while the receipts yet showed an excess upon those of last year and confidence in the deficiency of the crop was generally shaken, we wrote: "This is the last excess which we shall have to report, and we repeat our former advice, that our friends may with perfect confidence base their operations upon the anticipation of a very heavy falling off all through March and April—a decrease amounting perhaps to 400,000 bales to the first of May." That we should hazard so confident and definite predictions upon a matter seemingly so uncertain, caused surprise at the time, but it is now verified by the result in a remarkable manner, the decrease of receipts amounting this day to 409,000 bales. To make up a total of 2,000,000 bales we have now to receive 267,000, or 86,000 bales per month for the remaining four months of the season. It is not therefore likely that the result will vary greatly from that amount though it will be to some extent dependent on the forwardness of supplies from the new crop in August. At this period, in 1856, the receipts had fallen to 28,000 bales per week, yet the deliveries subsequently to this date amounted to 287,000 bales, or 20,000 bales more than would be necessary to make the present crop up to 2,000,000.

Exports, though not heavy, are greatly in excess of receipts: to Great Britain, this week, 42,000 bales; to France, 1,000, and to other foreign ports, 6,000—making a total of 49,000 bales, while American consumers have only taken 2,000 bales, a reduction in their takings which seems more than commensurate of our remarks of last week. One week, however, affords no rule in their operations.

The Money Circulars for Europe.—Expressly by Arabia.] NEW-YORK, Tuesday, April 28.

The tendency of the stock market during the past fortnight has been downward. In investment securities, although some few descriptions are rather more active, business is generally quite limited, while speculative operations in railroad shares continue on a very large scale. The fluctuations in the former have not been important. For the latter, prices have been very irregular. For a short time the market was quite steady, at about our last quotations, but the advance in the rate of interest by the Bank of England, in connection with the upward movement in bills on Europe, inducing renewed heavy sales, in anticipation of a decline, prices again receded rapidly, and, with a few exceptions, the depression was greater than that of the previous fortnight. The market has since been unsteady, but a slight advance upon the lowest points has been established, and there are some indications that no further material depreciation is likely to take place, unless the future financial advices from London should be of a very discouraging character. The present low prices, while they lead to the absorption, to some extent, of the floating stocks, have produced for investment, indeed, not less on the part of operators for a decline, in making contracts for future delivery.

The supply of Money continues abundant, notwithstanding a considerable reduction of Bank Loans during the fortnight; and although an increased export of Specie to Europe is anticipated, there are no apprehensions of any inconvenient stringency during the next two months. It is expected that the specie reserve of the banks will be maintained at about the present point, by the additions it will receive from the disbursements by the Sub-Treasury, which, up to the 1st of July, must largely exceed the revenue, and by the receipt of gold from California, and coin from the interior. CAMMANN & CO.

NEW-YORK, Tuesday, April, 28.

The principal transactions in Railroad Bonds have been in Illinois Central Construction without variation of price, in Harlem Railroad First Mortgage at an advance of ¼, and in La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad "Land grant" Bonds at a decline of 5¾ ₩ cent.

At private sale, Burlington and Missouri First Mortgage have been done at a further advance of 2¾ ₩ cent.; also sales of the different issues of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad and Galena and Chicago First Mortgage have been made without change of price. Money is easier, notwithstanding a contraction of the Bank loans during the week. No change in rates—paper, 6¾@11—with but little offering. DE COPPET & CO.

NEW-YORK, Tuesday, April 28.

The upward tendency which was beginning to be felt at the close of our previous advices of 20th inst. was of but short duration. On the 23d, the shares of Erie, Michigan Southern, and Cleveland and Toledo Railroad recommenced falling, touching at one time 41 for the first and 60 and 68¾ for the others, (the closing quotations, however, show a recovery of 5¾ ₩ cent. on Michigan Southern
